The organic approach to gardening recognises that the whole gardening environment is more than the sum of its parts, and that all living things are interdependent.

Organic gardening involves

- Treating the soil and growing environment as a resource to be husbanded for future generations
- Combating pests and diseases without using pesticides
- Thinking about the whole garden
- Encouraging wildlife
- Reducing pollution by recycling household and garden waste
- Taking new scientific discoveries into account, as well as good traditional ones
- Recognising the importance of genetic diversity
